PREFACE 1998 • Year of the Tiger
The poet brings light into great darkness, even if that means the simple becomes difficult or the difficult easy.

Hence the tiger may silence other beasts, the dragon frighten away birds in terrifying waves.

-Lu Chi (translated by Sam Hamill)
It is with satisfaction that I present you with this year’s new issue of Preface. I hope that readers will appreciate the dramatic change between this issue and those of years past. Having been increasingly dissatisfied with the lack of professionalism and polish in past issues, the staff and I decided to change Preface’s vision: we are now committed to printing the best student work, showcasing the finest of Goucher writers and exercising true editorial discretion. In addition to being far more critical in our approach to submissions, we have also decided to publish Preface in a book form, with three distinct sections of poetry, art and fiction. Goucher boasts many accomplished writers and artists, and it is time to present their work in a polished, sophisticated format, instead of dabbling in the “artsy,” chaotic ‘zine style, where poems are thrown together on the page with random graphics and sketches. In short, we have attempted to make Preface into a “real” literary arts journal, instead of a hastily laid-out imitation. We hope that during the next years Preface will build and solidify a reputation, consistently striving towards excellence in publishing.

I would like to thank Madison Bell and Susan Gossling for their time and energy in advising me, and Michelle from the Communications Department for donating an hour of her time to tutor us in Quark. Thanks also to my staff, and the tireless Erika and Rebecca, without whose endless patience and abilities Preface could never have been so transformed.

Sharae Deckard
Editor 1997-1998
Table Of Contents

Poetry:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Jonathan Musgrove</td>
<td>In Dreams I Handle Snakes</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jonathan Musgrove</td>
<td>simple love poem</td>
<td>8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jenn Crowell</td>
<td>34th Street, 4 p.m.</td>
<td>9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Audrey Babkirk</td>
<td>Blossom</td>
<td>10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Audrey Babkirk</td>
<td>First Sonnet</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Audrey Babkirk</td>
<td>Imperfect Sonnet</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Margaret Slack</td>
<td>Pearl</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jordanna Woodward</td>
<td>The Riddle</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sharae Deckard</td>
<td>Earth Walker</td>
<td>14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sharae Deckard</td>
<td>February Light</td>
<td>15</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jessica Dolber</td>
<td>Her</td>
<td>16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jer Welter</td>
<td>The Taxonomy of Man</td>
<td>17</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sarah Azizi</td>
<td>Something to Paint</td>
<td>18</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sarah Azizi</td>
<td>Poem for Three Years</td>
<td>19</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jennifer Parde</td>
<td>Orchard of Bitterness</td>
<td>24</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sheila Green</td>
<td>Desert Places</td>
<td>25</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Andrej Krasnansky</td>
<td>Red River Song</td>
<td>26</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jordie Shapiro</td>
<td>Via and disregarding Roots</td>
<td>28</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>R. Jason Leahey</td>
<td>Morning Hands</td>
<td>29</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Donna Maglio</td>
<td>The Talisman</td>
<td>30</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jonathan Colson</td>
<td>The Veins of a Leaf</td>
<td>31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Angela Regas</td>
<td>35 mi.</td>
<td>32</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Angela Regas</td>
<td>untitled</td>
<td>33</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Angela Regas</td>
<td>drown</td>
<td>34</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Megary Sigler</td>
<td>Rough Chords</td>
<td>35</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Megary Sigler</td>
<td>Broken Cocoon</td>
<td>36</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Janine Levin</td>
<td>Waiting</td>
<td>38</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sarah Smith</td>
<td>Mental Cirrhosis</td>
<td>40</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sarah Smith</td>
<td>A Lesson in Canton</td>
<td>41</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Art:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Artist</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Timothy Black</td>
<td></td>
<td>43</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Neel Patel</td>
<td></td>
<td>44</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Andrej Krasnansky</td>
<td></td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Aya Tsuchimochi</td>
<td></td>
<td>46</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Russel Drylie</td>
<td></td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Janine Levin</td>
<td></td>
<td>48</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Janine Levin</td>
<td></td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Angela Regas</td>
<td></td>
<td>50</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Timothy Black</td>
<td></td>
<td>51</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Corinna Yost</td>
<td></td>
<td>52</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chang Sun</td>
<td></td>
<td>53</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Janine Levin</td>
<td></td>
<td>54</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Fiction:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Sarah Azizi</td>
<td>Where I Come From</td>
<td>55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Karen Barbour</td>
<td>Seven Shades of Blue</td>
<td>58</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>R. Jason Leahey</td>
<td>Straight Time</td>
<td>65</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sarah Pinsker</td>
<td>Fall From Grace</td>
<td>70</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Reece McClung</td>
<td>Matching Plaid</td>
<td>73</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rebecca Knickmeyer</td>
<td>Telemachus</td>
<td>80</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
In Dreams I handle Snakes
-Jonathan Musgrove

Coral Snake
deadly, small black, yellow, red, ceramic finish

Scarlet King Snake
harmless, small, black, red, yellow, ceramic finish

Black on yellow, kill a fellow.
Black on red, go ahead.

Snake, small enough to be waiting inside a boot, for a foot, unsuspecting, bare, unhurried,
Should I fear you?

My ideal lover would suck, her tongue softly caressing, venom safely from my wound.
Spitting the poison, head back, she becoming fountain, her sprayed drops reach high to seduce sunlight, suspend it in spheres slowly falling to our bed, a quietly reflecting pool.

---

Copperhead
poisonous, the pattern and color of fallen leaves

They’re not easily found sunning on a well trodden dirt trail, often you will find them hiding under stones, leaves, rotting logs that disintegrate at your touch.

I turn over harboring rocks, stir suspicious piles of leaves.
I can feel them straining to bite my hand, their neck muscles strong between my thumb and finger.

---

Black Snake
non-poisonous, agile tree climber, jet

A beggar stands on the corner, cutting strips (with sharp shears) of night, folding them into black snakes.
The wind makes them twist and struggle.
As he holds them by the tail, they reach up, bend in half, trying to snatch an egg from the bird’s nest of his hand, relentlessly failing.
His eyes ask, “Ten bucks?” I’m tempted.
simple love poem
-Jonathan Musgrove

A broken piece of wandering jew slowly sprouts roots in a juice glass sitting on our kitchen windowsill. Before you moved in, I would have thrown the cutting in with the dirty paper towels and the pieces of half-eaten chicken. You filled a glass with clean water, carefully balanced the stem on the rim and said, “With a little patience, it will grow.”

34th Street, 4 p.m.
-Jenn Crowell

The city smells musky, metallic, like meat, warm with a madness you can almost taste. A violent lover, it knows where to kiss you and how to bruise you, sweetly sullen in the way it dredges up mistakes with a garish neon caress. You did not wear the right skirt. You were not articulate enough. You still gaze up at the buildings tall as promises, an awestruck child in the back of a cab, craning her neck, her skin stuck to black vinyl’s heat. Your dreams are car crashes waiting to happen: drama and smoke, fire and waifish infamy. You tip your head back. This could be beautiful, this moment of smouldery change. It won’t last long.
First Sonnet

-Audrey Babkirk

Your statue eyes cannot force back my glance,
Though in your stares I almost feel the rain.
And I would teach those leaden feet to dance
Upon my heart, indifferent to the pain.
Your straightened smile is weighted down by woes,
Charred scraps of life that gathered in your heart.
If I could bear that weight for you, who knows—
Perhaps your lovely lips might curve and part.
Thus would I take your torments for my joy,
And carry them like dust, though they be stones,
And all the shades of love I would employ
Would seep like fire into your very bones.
Life then will be eternal holiday,
And we shall laugh your sorrowed dreams away.

Blossom

-Audrey Babkirk

As she plants my mind wanders to thoughts of her serenity so fine, like drinking jasmine tea in the afternoon. She leans, lowers and the wheaty-colored hair falls like beads of water slipping over dark rocks.
The shadows and curves of her muscles strike me, how hard and real they are.
How much power to come from nothing
To shift and metamorphose in my arms, to see the strength increase with my food, within the warmth of my walls, from looking on my face.
And as she roots herself in the dirt like so many chrysanthemum bulbs absently decorating her hands with the rich, heady-smelling dirt, I see her as she is,
Long and taut with purpose in her hands.
And I can see her neck twist unnaturally with long purplish bruises and the silky straw hair tangled and matted against her face in dark congealed clumps of blood.
I know how her skin will feel:
a cold sweat, like fish in the back of my mouth.
She crouches, but I see her knees—the sound of her bones as they strain and crack in two—
When she breathes I see the wall of her heart exploding or her back crushed and crackling like so many pieces of cereal.
Her body as a thing, some heavy piece of cardboard—Veins and synapses shocked into stillness, following the last precious tremblings and quiverings.
Just as her boot is pushing down on the soil
I can see his foot pushing down on her back,
She unaware.

Imperfect Sonnet

-Audrey Babkirk

My love unleashes all things bright in me,
Or rather I reflect his brilliancy.
He finds gems I never knew I bore
And bears them up like humbled Melchior.
My muse and saints do all before him rise
And in his presence seek to harmonize.
The burning stars seem none too far to hold;
They light this life that through him is retold.
But whilst I throw my heart into the world,
With jubilation, banners all unfurled,
The mentor of my goodness shies and strays,
Tastes not the sweetness of my glory days.
Yet even from my shadow he still sings,
And gives the sinner in me angel wings.
Pearl
-Margaret Slack

The world is my oyster, and I am its pearl.
Yes, I am that annoying piece of sand
That sent this miniature world in a whirl
With my odd ways and mental sleight of hand.
A pearl is thought a rare and precious gain
To men who must pry ten shells to find one.
But that same pearl is just unneeded pain
To the tissues for whose sake it was spun.
The good of the whole is beyond my life
The world wants only exterior shine
There’s no thought for a grain’s internal strife
There’s no caring for a pain that’s just mine.
The world just repeats its nonchalant charm
Just cover it up, it’s doing no harm.

The Riddle
-Jordana Woodward

Slab of stone staring back at me
Born November 7, 1946- Died November 27, 1995 Father’s life between.
Above his icy corpse,
a dandelion’s bright head protrudes.
Taunting my grieving soul,
the plague of curator’s perfect green grass, it escapes the fatal, silvery blades.
Like the Guardian of Giza, the Lion’s tooth gorged on the corpse of the wrong answers to the Riddle.
My father, a prey to golden jaws, decays, yet brighter and brighter, the predator grows, hosting on Old Man’s bones.
Like my father, awaiting my chance to answer,
I know I will fail.
February Light
-Sharae Deckard
for c.m.

February is his favourite month.
The short month, the dead month.
How she hates it, the world outside.

In their hoods and grey coats
the students are great gliding bats, swooping blindly through the rain.

“Will this winter ever end?” she asks, touching her tender bruises,
the violent seals of his affection.

Beyond her, the students stop.
They raise wrinkled hands to the sky, whispering, “Look, Look now!”

The sun suddenly explodes in the trees, shivering the world with light.
She lifts up her violet face.

“We can’t change. We are lost,” she says.
But the students stand transfixed, drinking in the light.

Earthwalker
-Sharae Deckard

I rose and walked the earth through snow and deep and down the halls of sleep.

I sent my voice in song through dream and wind but did not find them there.

I heard them scold the sun and singe the sky,
I felt them brush me by.

Who saw them go, and how?
My eyes were closed,
my heart was folded tight.

Frost brings fear, dark and dull,
by night, by day.
Where did they go, which way?

The ocean weaves and winds, departs, returns,
but they are gone, are gone.

The days all fall and fail, the world grows dim before the wind’s lament.

Why walk the earth, why ask myself again,
where they have gone and when?

They went where all things go when winter comes,
and only shadows stay.
The Taxonomy of Man
-Jer Welter
for Barry Rudd
after John Hersey’s The Child Buyer

A piece of work, you, the scientist:
The tender age of ten and you are weary already of this world. It holds no horror as you watch it, detached. It lays open on the page.

But as you read the words before you:
“Penis,” “ovum,” “the mating ritual of Gasterosteus aculeatus”

(These words the work of Homo sapiens, Adam, he who classifies the beasts),
They call forth something non-objective, undeniable:
Thrust and thrust and thrust and thrust again.

You, precocious, now know that which parts the teacher from the taught, the codifier —
This, below your belt: Adulthood.

---

Her
-Jessica Dolber

When she told me my stained dress was beautiful, or asked if I needed help,
the purplish wart on her upper lip moved up and down, like a bubble gum bubble about to pop.

When she smoothed my hair, wiped my spilled milk,
or took my doll-sized hand in hers, her veins bulged like polluted rivers, flowing up her arm.

When she played Ring Around the Rosie with us, her scattered tufts of wiry white hair blew in the wind revealing shiny bald spots.

When she smiled down at me, the crevices and canals transformed her face into a relief map,

and someday, I wanted to look just like her.
A Poem for Three Years
-Sarah Azizi

I. October

We met on a lazy day when even the fog refused to move.

You were stuck at the diner
until the mechanic could get there.

I told you the coffee was on the house,
made conversation,
made you laugh,
found out you lived just seven blocks from me,
said I’d stop by sometime.

II. February

I knew all I knew of you from your drunkenness.

Our friends told you to quit “getting toasted” every weekend, but I wanted your addiction to keep raging.

It was my only window.

Something to Paint
-Sarah Azizi

It is almost night and Andy Warhol sits on his couch, eating Honey Roasted Peanuts, drinking his fifth beer.

Before the six-pack is finished, a masterpiece will be born.

Andy picks at the stuffing that escapes from the faded brown material.
He’s hypnotized by the images escaping from the shiny brown box.

Andy sighs.
He hasn’t painted anything for weeks.
He scratches his belly—in spite of the beer, his bones still stick out.

Andy’s too lazy to get up and change the channel.

FLASH!
There she is,
arms open wide,
dress sewn onto hips and soft breasts.
The red mouth opens:
“I wanna be loved by you/you and nobody else but you...”

Andy puts down the beer can,
the wet condensation still on his hand, and he reaches.
Down, down, down into the faded corduroy’s, under the ratty Hanes,
and he sighs again.

Now,
he has something to paint.
III. July
You paid off that new used car by subletting your apartment delivering lumber across the mid-west.

On a mosquito-filled night, you passed through the town.

I invited you to stay.
We listened to jazz, smoked herb,
watched the children chase lightning bugs through the trees outside my window.

You smoked too much,
drank too much,
started the morning drive, two hours last, cursing, “that’s fifty goddamn bucks I lost.”

IV. November
Chance moved us into the same building.
It was a shitty part of town, but we ignored the nightly screams, the daily sirens.

Sometimes we visited.

Sometimes, I heard the clink of brown bottles, imagined them littering your coffee table,

listened to you forget.

Most times, I sat by my window, smoked cigarettes,
and stared at naked trees, wondering if I was crazy to love you in silence.

V. March
I woke one morning and decided to stop ignoring what was happening to me.

I made coffee, poured you a mug full,
black.

You were packing
when I knocked.
You were leaving, moving in with a woman whose name you’d never mentioned. I smiled, wished you luck,
anded you the coffee.
You kept the cup.

VI. September
The week before the leaves turned orange she left you.
We sat on your porch.

I offered to help make the home feel full, feel like yours.
I’d hang dried flowers, decorate the walls,
organize your dishes,
make curtains for the windows.

You were crazy drunk.
I was in the kitchen, cleaning the mess of bottles and cans. You watched me find a sponge, wipe the sticky beer foam from the countertop.

You kissed me,
held my breasts,
pulled my hips to you.
I saw the dead of your eyes, pushed you away,
drove home in silence.

VII. December
I think of you alone in that house.
Your curtailless windows black with night.

I imagine the women you sleep with-- see them decorate your bed in silk.

I try to forget the kitchen, and I am failing.

VIII. April
I heard-- you are hauling lumber again;
you feel you may never leave the truck the road, the wild expanse of motels, hotels, bars, diners,
state lines, city limits.

I tell myself,
“she won’t come back she was drunk
she doesn’t remember and she won’t come.”

I go to the bars now.
I laugh, I dance, I smoke,
I talk, I drink.
And I have decided to refuse to miss you.
Desert Places
-Sheila Green

He pulls to the side of the road
And whistles in a breathy tone.
I watch him contort through The window
To get:
“The Perfect Picture.”
He wants me to see what he sees Know what he knows.
Awe passed through Concave and convex lenses, silver, Kodachrome.
He feels free here
He flies in the desert and takes everything in.
Perhaps his camera will be My eye
And I will know what it’s like to love this Desert.
But all I see
Is the ocean without water.
This must be what it’s like to lie
At the bottom of the sea.
Blue presses on me with the weight of open eyes.
Help.
I am drowning in sky.

Orchard of Bitterness
-Jennifer Parde

Once again, I have caught you naked and red-hearted
Snooping around the plot of my sacred grounds.
So you are captivated by my mystic fruits, eh?
Ah, but they’re yours for a mere donation...

Bitterness is the spawn of my mangled trees,
Warped and contorted from exposure to a torrid sun
And I, brute keeper of these fatal beauties, Keep close watch over my prize-winning orchard.

My first seed was offered as a parting token
From a dearly demented and treasured friend
In years since, each plant has been nurtured with care,
Each fruit savored with euphoric gluttony.

As you see, mine are the first of tangible treats,
Pleasurable to the eye and smooth to the touch.
Each bite is, of course, “preservative and fat free,” Natural as the Eden from which it was bred.

So you wish to sample some of my wares?
I will allow you to take this first bite for free but I warn you that mine is an easy and demanding addiction
The nerves are captivated by syrup-ridden vileness.

But my prices, dear friend, are impossible to beat:
A dozen of my best for your cold embrace
If you like what you taste, these make excellent gifts
And I will make deliveries to whomever you wish.
Red River Song
-Andrej Krasnansky

The wind rolls lustily across my face and runs her fingers through my hair
I breathe as I walk, naturally so, and take of her as I always have an involuntary muscle, on auto-pilot, how am I to know what light I squelch each time I take a step what calculator to know what I owe for my abuse when light is given free but freely taken

I have not come to bore you with moans
I only wished to lend you my eyes and perhaps you’ll tell me where my blind spot is there is a lady down below whose heart ought to have known better quarters than in me she waits, with the moon turning redder by the hour and the streetlights flickering, on and off, like a cricket’s song telling me the temperature bare fingers, bare bones, I have always said my friend, whose light is in your bedroom so that it shines like none I’ve ever seen when you leave me to retire

but masters of the butterflies do not tarry with long seek-ings but act and snatch as they know they must am I a net then? why do you ask have you not said you know me 3 times now but do you know the secret, then there is one word, one sense, that, if found, will make it all worthwhile and I could go on eating bread and water and soaking the fire’s heat and I would not worry so about the truth and the parasite for that word would say it for me and I would be spoken for at last the fire in your place dims

I go out, face the wind back to my red-moon ardent if she can forgive me once again for everything i know i’ll do Morning Hands
-R. Jason Leahey

You have hands like the morning.
Slender and smooth
Spinning out tales of the sunrise
Smelling of coffee from a Village coffeehouse
On a Sunday morning in May
When the streets smile up like a toddler, Curious and mischievous,
And smell sweet and wet.
And the sun dribbles down like green water Through the tree branches.

replace
-R. Jason Leahey
for Paul, Bob, Tommy and Chris garage prophets scream from the cracked corner bathroom stalls, calling for Paul on Marlboro-coated tongues, with nothing to show except blood-shot eyes and loose scraps of paper, lying in the corners of unvacuumed Chevy back seats and thrown out with the old gum wrappers.

Via and disregarding Roots
-Jordie Shapiro

Clouds graze.
Ducks pass, bickering and in the living field
All is personal despite inanimate limbs
I run in half-speed and wink at the trees I pass.
Balance closes her eyes and spins
She screams suddenly, amiably
And collapses in giggle
I too, rush to fall letting the soft earth tickle.

We gaze to the liquid cloud with cigarettes making angels in the soil.
Our fingers dig like starfish marooned in the glistening sand

Balance cumbersonely takes to her legs
Holds forward her chimney fingertips “These remind me that I am not five.” She says, sighs and darts to toes.

In the surreal night,
even the silent brush has meaning.
Our chambers of flesh and hair the only tie to yesterday’s mind, to the mind of tomorrow,
the mind of Real, of productivity, of society.
We have fallen in love with liminality.
But forget not our roots, our bones, our real names our places in the Real for we know we must return
The Veins of a Leaf
-Jonathan Colson

Within the veins of a leaf
I see the outline of your face, staring back at me-motionless.
And when your lips begin to part and a sound creeps from your fragile frame, a fall wind gusts-carrying you away into baleful clouds;
daring to stain my face with icy rain.

The Talisman
-Donna Maglio

In memory of “Big Bob”

The blue cloud of Lucky Strike smoke has cleared. No more car parts spread over the driveway on a Sunday afternoon. The tugboat captain has gone out to sea.
Forty years of living crammed into a lonely Staten Island apartment.
No family,
only friends,
to sort through the remainders.
One less
plate at birthday parties.
One less gritty laugh.
One less
wrinkled cheek to kiss goodbye.
Now, a small wooden seagull is the only memory. Carved by his hands, it sits on my desk,
only a glance away.
Whenever I am upset
I stare at it.
I am staring at it right now.
I remember the men that came to our door shuffling bodies that seemed to be made of dirt they looked at me, a girl with cheeks that showed a dozen years of birthday cake

Trabajo? they asked and I understood what they meant enough to answer always, no trabajo no trabajo para ti

Then I watched them leave to continue their walk down the stretches of America like missionaries, searching for in god we trust searching for the hope written on a couple dollars in spare change

They searched for someone to believe in the worth of their hands because no one believed in the worth of their souls anymore forever,” I say to the trembling seconds and the Bear in the sky

Ursa bends down and pulls my soul in his teeth and we sink westward toward the ocean

I reach for your arms to carry you with me across the arc of a moment and on your arms I leave teeth marks in the shape of my hands
   (the ocean will not wash them away) and so what has always been is now because forever stretches us both ways“ drown

-Angela Regas

somewhere past the mountains, far enough away that the sky bears no resemblance to water and the people have no memory of swimming a long time ago

somewhere, where the sunset looks like rock looks like dreams looks like fire the bones of dinosaurs crawl beneath the still-warm dust

and the dust crawls, slowly westward towards the mountains, pulling away from the land and enlarging the sky until the weight of it falls like rain again

and the people stretch their thirsty arms up to hold back the deluge, their hands becoming lakes and their arms becoming rivers, and they fill, and fill and drown

Rough Chords
-Megary Sigler

Today it was the blues that got me through:
a hard handful of leather-rough chords strung out on thick, sandpaper sound, gristle and grease,
like what’s scraped into the dog bowl after Sunday supper.

Or steak and chicken sound to clench your jaws around, belted

like a battle cry,
like a protest on a picket line, wrenched up from thready, unscabbed holes,
a resonating rhythmic rawness slickened into white Gardenia sweet, or plump and fleshy like a sequined alto breast

Stirring with dark power and truth: bare and gritty as a hound-chewed bone, hard as a palm-heel smack.

Broken Cocoon
-Megary Sigler

Bare-creaky-floored apartment.
Dust balls and balled-up felines fat as grease spilling over the shredded, fringe-draped sofas.

Top floor apartment where I nestle invisible against the snuggled pulse of the dark.

I watch the snow flake against the pink dust of dawn and Domingo saturates the space in milk-chocolate sound

Drenching my body

Cluttering the shelves with smooth, vibrating arches of Italian volutuously buttered in Puccini’s song.

It resounds in Suzanne’s grotesque antiques, piles of blue sea-glass and gull feathers, horrified sculpures that twist and breathe when they think that

I’m sleeping.

Music my music
Louder than is considerate

Louder than my mom would allow

Wine-red and surging
Rattling the apartment Splitting open the ceiling and sponging me in the scalding rawness of ache.

My ache.
My own.

The fattest black cat turns his plump lethargy to squint, with sea-glass eyes
at my magnificent grin.
Waiting
-Janine Levin

He sits at home alone

Daddy’s out getting drunk and Mommy’s gone for good

Dry spaghetti and Michelob was his dinner and now he’s having dessert; his last cigarette

The tv’s playing in the background as is the radio- the Doors, his favorite

It’s almost 2am and I can hear his heart breaking even over the phone

He tells me he wishes I were there, even though he knows it’s impossible

He picks up his guitar and strums softly, singing along quietly, his voice cracking with each syllable

I know his cat is there, asleep on his feet, and it’s comforting to know that he’s not alone;

He gets reckless when he’s alone

I feel guilty for the fact that my parents, both of them, sleep in the next room, and that I am so loved

I fear for him for when his dad comes home, for what might happen if he gets too drunk,
   for the possible consequences of his depression

He hums ever so softly and sounds at peace

I listen intently, afraid to say the wrong thing for fear that he’ll hang up

He has no idea how much I care, or does he? I’ll never know; he doesn’t say much

Yet I can sense that he’s glad I’m there and I sit back, waiting for him to break the silence that scares me so.
Mental Cirrhosis
- Sarah Smith

gripping the sink with white knuckles and vomiting
yellow stomach acid jelly,
I glance in the mirror.

my eyes,
swollen half-shut,
have yellowed in the corners.
circles around them,
dull grey, like worn tires.

Every heave hollows me further.

Perhaps
all the drinking and drugs have caught me.

thoughts no longer come like monsoons;

my words are still waters.

A Lesson in Canton
- Sarah Smith

He was crabbing off the pier.
The way he squatted over the water intrigued me.
I walked over and watched as he raised a string with a small crab swinging perilously from the end.

Netting it,
then glancing at me, he said
“This one’s too small”, tossed it back.
It vanished in the harbor’s murky water.
He must have noticed my rapt eyes and caught the trace of disappointment in them because his lit up.
“But I have another in the cooler”.
We walked over to a small Igloo and he opened the lid.
A “Holy shit”, faintly audible,
was all my mouth could manage.

He was laying on a bed of ice, broad white belly up,
at least nine inches from claw to claw.
He filled the cooler.
The man picked him up by the midsection and held him at arm’s length.
October’s sunlight gleamed off his shell and furious snapping claws.
Standing there speechless, I thought bluecrab blue is a color that crayon companies should never try to duplicate.
Their imitations will be feeble.

Beaming he said
“That’s what they call a jumbo down at Albrecky’s market”, set him back on the ice, shut the cooler.
I could hear muffled clacking against the plastic.

The man was checking the other lines now.
“Do you catch a lot?”
“Actually yeah . . . most of them are pretty small though”
He attached a dirty pink clump to the empty end of his string.
“What do you use?”
“Chicken . . . chicken necks actually.
They’re scavengers, and if they find something on the bottom they usually don’t let go.”

I wished him a good day, told him to take care,
and continued walking down the landing, fascinated by the notion that crabs chasing chicken necks are tenacious.

Even along the bottom of the ocean, there is still perseverance.
Last night, I dreamt myself a murderess. I walked stiffly through my house, tiptoed up endless steps, and pushed open the door of my parent’s bedroom. They were both awake; my father was lying on his back, oxygen tank by his side, and my mother was propped on her elbows beside him. Without a word, I confidently made my way to my father’s body and plunged my heavy carving knife into his chest. I turned the knife around and around, carving shapes into his paper-thin flesh. I was grinning; my father was smiling; my mother was whimpering. My knife kept moving, swiftly, turning only at bones, because there was nothing else inside his body.

Where I come from, we talk only of what should have been and what should be. My Amu Masood and my mother say to my Mamangee, “You should have been here. You are his maman. He asked for you. Why did you not come? Why did you wait until he died?” My mamangee tells us, “I could not come. My health would not let me. My heart would not survive. I buried one of my children when I was seventeen. I could not bury another. He should not have died in America. Why did you not bring him home?”

Two months after we buried my father, my Mamangee came to the United States. She brought the grief of forty-five years and two months with her. With my hand on each side of the window, holding the white curtains back, I stood in our kitchen and watched her short, round body heave itself from my Amu Masood’s car. I watched her solid frame walk to our door. When my mother opened it, I saw my Mamangee stumble as our house absorbed her grief. With every step across the shiny linoleum and rough carpeting my father had crossed every day, my Mamangée let a year of memories go. Finally, wailing my father’s name, she fell into my mother’s arms and my mother whispered to her, “Beshiim Maman, Beshiim.”

Before my father came to America, he had seen snow once. A light dusting had fallen in his village when he was seven. After a year in the mountains of West Virginia, he learned to despise the snow. Every winter, he would stand at the window in the family room and search for signs of spring. He would pass the graying of the seasons in warm flannel shirts and worn-out jeans, sitting on the couch with a philosophy book. When winter arrived in its full force, he would bundle himself up, spend hours shoveling snow off our long, twisted driveway, and swear the whole time, the words shooting out of his mouth so fast that tiny beads of spit would fly in all directions.

I had the dream again last night. This time, every-thing—the house, me, my father, my mother—looked as if it had been washed over with indigo paint. The blueness was thick; it made me slow, languid. My smile was even bigger this time, and my knife exited my father’s flesh drenched with black blood.

I hardly saw my father during the last months of his life. I was too busy making sure I was acting normal.
His decline was fast; he became disease. Only once did he and I cry together.

My mother’s voice cracked as she told me he had six months to a year left. I hated her for that. I hated her for not being the strong one. I hated myself for believing that someone had to be the strong one. I hated her for being American. I hated her for not understanding the instinctual needs my sister and I had; we had to pretend the fear of losing control for a second was too great. We could not speak about what was happening; we could only think of the injustice of death and disease. And I knew, when her crackling voice told me, that if I let the meaning of her words burn me, my fear would render me powerless.

Moments later, I sat face to face with my father. I clung to him, and our silent tears spoke for us.

Two months later, he was dead. Two months later, my aunt woke me at 8 a.m. on a Saturday morning. She said, “It’s time.” I ascended the steps to my parents’ bedroom and took my father’s hand. My mother was telling him to go, that we knew he had to, and she told me to echo her words. All I wanted was for him to die. I didn’t want to hear anymore, see anymore, feel anymore.
I had spent the winter listening to his lungs die, listening to his coughing, his wheezing, his moaning, his fear that he wouldn’t die fast enough.

It took an hour for him to die. I remember five minutes of it.

Driving along the highway, I see leaves changing colors, falling, and some trees are already bare as November sets in. They frighten me. I remember that my father’s final fall was spent traversing these highways, pavement carrying him from doctor to doctor, pill to pill, and diagnosis to diagnosis. His final trip down these highways showed him only barren dirt and naked trees.

I had the dream for the third time last night. I woke in a sweat, my right hand clutching my bedpost so hard my hand had turned red, my knuckles white. I let go and bit my hand, bit it hard to muffle any sound that might escape from my throat. I pulled on my robe and ran to the shower. I stood under the hot water for an hour, letting my tears join the water so that I wouldn’t know which was which. I let myself wail into the sound of the rushing water. I whispered to myself, “Beshiim, Beshiim.” Seven Shades of Blue
-Karen Barbour

The summer rain beat against the windows with a force the pounding bass couldn’t quite drown out. He sat on the sofa, back to the dark windows, staring blankly at the painting on the wall above the plants, paying no heed to the storm’s fury or the fact that it was the fourth time through that particular CD. He sipped from the glass in his hand absently, and noted that the yellow leaves touching the canvas were probably yellow because he hadn’t watered them since she left. The piece was the first one she gave to him. He remembered how timidly she showed him her work. Every painting was a piece of her, and it was hard for her to show that inner-self to the world. Memories flooded through his soggy brain. He wanted to cry, had wanted to ever since that day two weeks ago, but the tears were spent, overpowered by rum-and-cokes, daiquiris, martinis, and on bad nights, vodka. He raised his hand and tilted his head to look at the empty glass, thinking the glass must have a leak in it; it was all gone again. Though he didn’t know it, she too, was thinking of him. Wondering if she could have done things differently. Wondering if what she felt was regret.

The night passed, the storm passed, and he sat as if dead, eyes blurring over the painting until the colors swirled around behind his eyelids whenever he blinked. When he awoke, fire smoldering in his stomach and head bleary and heavy, the sun was high, glistening off the wet leaves so that the world seemed to be made of colored glass beads. He always treated his hangovers to a shower and a large breakfast. He let the water stream over him, first cold then hot, but he didn’t feel the icy stream that numbed his thighs and raised small goose-bumps along his arms. Nor did he feel the scald of the steaming water as it turned his face pink, then red. He was if dead. He knew this, could see himself, removed. Could see himself a zombie, a shell of a man.

He scrambled eggs the way she taught him: mixed with seltzer water to make them fluffy, with a pinch of dill. To his thick tongue they tasted like cardboard. He could feel himself sinking into the rut again, knew that something had to change before he sank too far, but he didn’t care. Couldn’t make himself care.

She hummed to herself as she worked. The easel, slanted, was warm and light in the sun. She swirled the colors around on the palette. Her favorite part was the colors. She loved making them new, unique hues of green-gold and indigo-charcoal. Each color asked for life. New-leaf green, autumn moon pale yellow. The hardest part was the first stroke on the naked canvas. Confining each color to an object. Even as a child she hadn’t been able to color inside the lines. The crayonings would skip outside the shapes, making skies purple or oceans yellow. Now she started with a loose stroke of russet. It wasn’t until she began to shape it that she realized it was the color of an autumn leaf, the color of his hair.

Couldn’t make himself care. That was the problem. He knew it, but was powerless to change it. He consoled himself he still had some pride left: he couldn’t call and beg. Maybe it would be better if he did. Considering this, he realized the point was moot, he wouldn’t be able to do it anyway. He had tried to once. At least he thought he remembered trying. He had started to clean up the house, going through the motions of starting a new life, when he decided what the hell and opened a bottle of whiskey. He dimly recalled, several shots later, cradling the phone with tears running down his face because he couldn’t remember the numbers. He was always crying about dumb things now: losing last month’s would calculate how much faster a partnership would be offered now that he was out of the way.

This truth didn’t make him feel enlightened. Not even depressed. Just tired. He was so tired all the time now. He would sit on the porch in his old spot, or in the dining room, or the living room. And his eyelids would feel heavy and slow. But sleep wouldn’t come. Only at night, when the gin and tonic had thinned his blood and his thoughts, would sleep rescue him. Sleep was wonderful, blissful, because it passed the time.

She missed her cat. She had left her behind, hoping to hurt him, but now she missed the soft entwining around her legs, and the weight on her foot as adoring eyes gazed up asking for dinner, or attention, or whatever. At odd times she’d find herself thinking of him, remembering his quick, white smile or the funny rumble at the end of his laugh. She missed the talking, late at night, on the back porch. The easy camaraderie of friends, rather than lovers, gave the amiable ramblings a depth. Everything seemed important; the unseasonably warm fall was as significant as the pro-life/pro-choice debate. He listened well. He’d look at her seriously, as if carefully considering everything she said. It wasn’t hero worship - that would have been tiring. Instead he gave her his full attention and that was unexpectedly restful. She’d always hated those late-night debates during her college years. Superficial students seated in a circle, pretending to listen, to understand, while all the time just waiting till they could say their thing, which no one else cared about. But he’d actually cared what she thought.

The painting was taking shape now: a lone, gray eyed figure in the corner gazing out across a twilight bay at a light house shining like a ray of star light in the heavy dusk. The dark waters met the infinite sky at an ambiguous horizon and the gray eyes looked wistful and l scared of herself when she saw the results of her hand. That was why it was so hard to share her work with others - not the public, they didn’t care about her - but with him, because he knew that it was a piece of her lying exposed on that canvas. Maybe that was why she left, she mused, maybe because he knew her better then she knew herself. She had no doubt that she was dangerous, she was protecting him, she excused herself. But a part of her wondered if in running away, she was really running away from herself.

He noticed for the first time how many hues were in the painting above the skeletal plants. The sky overpowered the picture, overpowered the huddled figure on the thin strip of ground on the bottom two inches. The man sat, knees to chest, forehead to knees, looking very small under the force, the weight, of so much sky. Her paintings were always like that - lonely and filled with the raw power of exploring human insignificance. He understood what they encompassed because he too, often felt like that. Critics droned about tone and line and form, but he judged a work of art by the reaction it provoked in him. He noticed that the sky was not flat, but deep. A trick of the light perhaps, or a certain talent with perspective, but that sky was alive. He felt if he looked long enough, he’d be able to see sunlight glinting off the hull of a distant airplane, or a flock of Canadian geese traveling in their southward V. The myriad blues of the sky looked like a feat of nature, not of pigments. And he was amazed all over again.

She cleaned up the brushes, letting the liquid in the jar turn from transparent to cerulean to murky chocolate. She stared appraisingly into the gray eyes of the young man in the corner. She knew that look well. It was the look he got sometimes when he stared up into the night.
It always surprised people when she mentioned it. They generally asked her things like, “So, are you still in school or are you going to college?” while she was filling their coffee cups. Most of the time she just said that she was in school. Every once in a while, though, she would mention that she had been married since May when she was 17, and she would secretly relish the discomfort she could see squirming just beneath their skin while she continued to calmly clear their plates from the stained wooden tables. Most of the time, though, she just said she was in school.

She had gotten married for a variety of reasons, not the least of which was the fact that she was bored with her life. She hadn’t gotten knocked up like some of the kids at school joked about, she had no intention of ever having kids, she just felt like a change. She had met Caston at a “street party,” one of those they had on Friday nights at the dead end of a street where everyone drank beer until the cops came, and they had started dating. He was three years older and promised some sort of excitement even if it was only in a quick round of sex on the couch in his parents’ basement. Her mother had gotten married when she was 19, so when Caston, 19 at the time, proposed, none of it seemed too unusual.

They had moved into a two room apartment, which Caston’s parents paid for over the first six months as a wedding gift. They had a television with premium cable, Caston’s old stereo, a bed and two tables in the main room. By the bed was a chrome-legged table with a phone and an ashtray made from a large clam shell. The kitchen had a fridge and freezer combo, a sink, and a stove. Off to the side of the kitchen was a bathroom with a small shower. The night they moved in, they tried to take a

The living room seemed alive again, with no traces of the dusty bottles and sticky rings from when he forgot to use a coaster. The house seemed larger now, and it echoed disturbingly sometimes late at night. He still missed the warm smile over morning coffee, and the breathy mumbling in her sleep, but he realized, somewhat sadly, that he was becoming re-acquainted to being alone. The office managed to fill the day again, barely, but enough. Sometimes he’d still sit on the back porch after dark, but the cold stillness of the air made it hard to breathe, and more often now, he’d go to a singles bar, carefully drinking O’douls or a virgin cocktail, and smile. The smile hadn’t reached his eyes yet - it was still in the experimental stages on his stiff lips, but his heart no longer felt like a lead weight. He smiled again at the blonde at the corner table. She noticed what beautiful, soul-searching eyes he had and smiled back, beckoning him over. He looked like the kind of man she wanted to spend more time with: sensitive, supportive, wise. The kind of man who really listened.

and felt inadequate because he couldn’t imagine infinity. He was inscribed there forever. She knew now she’d never go back, but that look was safely remembered on the canvas, He was remembered on that canvas. And humming softly to herself, she laid the picture in the sun to dry.
He had shaggy blond hair, slightly greasy, and green eyes that danced behind the flopping mop. He smiled when she filled his cup and said “Thanks,” and when she raised her eyes to meet his, she couldn’t help smiling back. He smiled wider, showing a set of off-white teeth with a chip missing from his third tooth left from the middle. She giggled to herself and brushed her bangs back from behind her right ear before she skipped back to the kitchen for a cigarette. She made a conscious effort to sort of swing her hips.

When she finished her cigarette she headed back to the front and leaned in the door jamb between the cash register and the kitchen. Her watch said 11:00 – an hour and a half until her break. She started across the dining room at him while he spun a quarter like a top on the table. Every minute or two he glanced out the window, then went back to his quarter. She wondered what his name was. He looked too cool to be a “Matt” or “Chris;” something with more character, like “Emille” or “Jarret,” maybe something really different like “Damien.” She’d always liked the name Damien. He seemed pretty old, maybe 23 or 24. She tried to remember if she could recognize him from high school. She didn’t. She wondered if he did. Was he a college student? Maybe he was one of those people from an upper middle class family that did well in school and then took a year off just to travel around. He sort of looked like that: neo-hippie bohemian.

Carol, the manager, nudged her and she sprang out to fill the tea glass of a middle-aged man with specks of graying blond in his red beard. Then trotted back to the register. What could she say to him?

He got up from his table and aimlessly walked over to the juke box. No one ever played the juke box until at least 5:00. She looked at her watch: 11:30. He dropped the quarter in the machine and fumbled around in his pockets, pulling out some other coins, half a roll of
When the oven timer buzzed, she just sat on the floor sipping her beer. Caston looked at her, tiredly pushed himself up from the couch, and went to fetch the dinner. That night they watched TV until he fell asleep on the floor with his head resting in her lap. She woke him up at 10:30 and they went to bed. She stayed awake, long after face down into the pillow, letting the darkness flood in, while the scent from Caston’s hair lingered in her nostrils.

Certs, and a hair band before finding it. He dropped that one in and punched four buttons. An old Allmann Brothers tune squeaked out as he made his way back to the table. Definitely– neo-hippie bohemian.

She watched him, picking at his fingernails now since he had lost the quarter, as he glanced over the menu again before slipping it back behind the salt and pepper shakers. Did he have a girlfriend? He probably did; he had that charming “I just don’t care” look about him. Maybe he was a poet. She could imagine him wandering the country writing poetry. He looked wiry, though; he probably spent a lot of time outdoors.

Should she go speak? His coffee didn’t need to be refilled but she could still go over and just be friendly. Maybe if she saw his smile once again the broken tooth, she could get a glimpse of who he was, crack the mystery behind his blond bangs and green eyes.

Carol nudged her again and she rung up a 20-something business woman in a jacket and long black skirt. The woman needed change for a tip. She left a quarter.

She shut the register and backed up to the door jamb, taking her watching place, and looked over towards the table. He wasn’t there, just a folded five and two ones. She quickly swiveled her head to the left and caught his eye as he walked out behind an older woman. He smiled at her and then was out the door.

When she got home from the restaurant, Caston was already there, sitting in front of the TV. She went to the kitchen and put two frozen dinners in the oven before popping a beer and falling onto the ground and resting up against the chair that held her husband. He was dirty. He hadn’t even bothered to wash his face, and the deep tan of airborne dirt was streaked with lines from tears of sweat.
Fall From Grace
-Sarah Pinsker

That was the night that Al Muniver vomited white foam across the floor of the hospice, and I was forced to look for God in every doorway on my way home. That was my game then, played silently with every panning hand and sleeping freak: are you the person who’s going to change things? Just biding your time? I gave no less than a dime, even to the slumming uptown kids. That night, I bought dinner for a bag lady.

She was middle-height, middle-weight, a good deal more than middle-aged. Sixty or so, at least, bent under her bags and greyer than the street. I invited her to join me, and we ate in a diner just across the street from where she had been settling herself for the night. “The Three Brothers Restaurant,” and there really had been three brothers originally, the woman told me, and they had fed her leftovers on long cold evenings. The waiter obviously was not one of them: he threw dirty looks at us as frequently as he could, and she ordered a BLT, no B, no T. Mayo and cheese. “Why not just order a cheese sandwich?” I asked, playing with the yellow crust on my fork.

“It makes ‘em pay more attention to what they’re making, makes ‘em think about the customer for a minute. They’re gonna make me a fresh sandwich, even if they have a case full of cheese sandwiches already made.” She smirked.

Her name was Shel, and her belongings took up the entire footspace beneath the booth. She carried two small white plastic bags, “Food Emporium” stretched in green across the bulging sides; and one enormous one, a canvas sack that protruded well into the aisle. I kicked at it a bit, trying to feel what was inside: it felt in equal parts as soft as clothing, as hard as bone.

I watched her as she ate, long after I had finished my own tuna on rye. She had torn the bread crusts from her own sandwich when it had arrived, setting them neatly aside. With puffy gray fingers, she had grasped a knife and fork in trembling fists, and diced her sandwich. She never chewed, but let each morsel disintegrate slowly in her mouth, eyes closing as each one first touched her tongue, opening again. “My teeth gone fall out,” she told me cheerfully, sucking on a long piece of bread crust at the end of the meal. I told her that I had never considered that, and wondered secretly whether that meant that they were going to fall out, or they already had.

She told me that she had been a nurse of sorts, and I told her that I still was one, sort of. Nursing implies that some sort of healing process is involved. She agreed, and called me a shepherd; I wasn’t sure that it was any better than before, but I took what she gave me. Shel was sick herself; she had been dismissed - “severed,” in her own words. She was doing better at surviving than she had thought she would. She was taking longer to die than she had thought she would, was the way she put it.

After dinner, I watched her drag her bags back into the doorway she had claimed earlier, which had waited unmolested for her return. She settled herself within a nest of bags, and drew from the largest one a huge pair of wings. I watched as she folded her feathers around herself, and curled up against the doorframe.

When I was younger, there was an ice skating rink near my house. There was a bowling alley sharing rent; the rink was maybe the length of a lane, maybe the width of four or five. The owner was an old woman, in her sixties at least, with the pillowy fat that bulges out of some people at strange angles, so that it doesn’t show if they look at themselves just right. Every weekend, twice on Saturday, three times on Sunday, she would clear all the skaters away. Tinny music would spill out of the tinny speakers, and she would step onto the ice, alone.

Her name was Charlotte Mills, or something equally benign. She had been an Olympic alternate at one point, I think, had won some important competitions. I imagine she was small and willowy and graceful, then. Now she was merely small and lumpy. She danced around the ice to her chosen waltz, throwing in spins and single jumps every once in a while. It was excruciating to watch. Did she realize she was no longer graceful, and skate in spite of that, merely for the joy it brought her? I don’t think it had crossed her mind that things were different now. What does a jogger do when he realizes he can no longer jog, or a surgeon when her hands tremble too much? I can think of nothing worse.

Are angels finite creatures? I think of the stories that I was told as a child, and of the time walking home from synagogue on Yom Kippur with my grandfather when I had seen through the clouds to the open gate of heaven. I choose not to dwell on the day an angel told me that she could no longer work, but really, I can think of nothing else.

Matching Plaid
-Reece McClung

She was one of those people who gripped the bottle just a little too tightly. Her thin fingers wrapped around the amber neck, clenched so they seemed to squeeze the condensation out of the glass. The rim pressed hard against bloody-red lips as she bit off another sip. She curled her lip with every swallow, not to seem tough or mature but because she secretly couldn’t stand the taste of beer. Anyone watching would have noticed that she held the expression a little too long, but no one was.

She sat on a round, green footstool by the door, watching. The room she surveyed was dancing, laughing, spinning in every direction at once, but she didn’t as much tap a foot. A girl across the room screamed as some jock heaved her across his shoulder. The girl was laughing, beating him on the ass with one hand while trying to keep from falling out of her dress with the other. She looked young, too young to be here, with thick black eyeliner and rouge caked on to mask her age. The jock pounded his chest with his bottle and then thrust it in the air like liberty’s torch. His two friends laughed with vicious smiles. The jock gestured wildly, saying something that made their eyes widen and compelled them to clink their bottles.

A clot of people wandered in front of the green footstool just as the jock, in a flourish of machismo, kicked his heel out and spun in a pirouette, drawing even louder shrieks of convulsive laughter from the girl on his shoulder. The sound of breaking glass snapped the attention of the room to where they had stood, and as the crowd passed she could see the girl propped on one elbow on the floor next to an overturned chair and a shattered glass. The jock struggled to his feet, stumbling off toward
She pretended not to notice, turning her back to the voice.

“Hey..” the drunk voice said, “Hey you, I think he... he likes you.” The voice paused in mid stream to suppress a belch, and then continued. “Do I know you? Hey, do you hear me?” the voice said, “I’m Sarah’s friend Emily...” Without acknowledging her presence, she slipped away from the voice and into the stream. She had connected no face to it, and it quickly faded, swallowed by the crowd.

She worked her way toward the front door, side stepping cups and the occasional piece of trash. Someone had brought the lawn jockey in from outside and placed it on the lip, her fingernail clinking against the glass. She smiled. The bottle teetered on the edge, and she pushed it over.

“Can I get you another?” The intrusion snapped her attention away from the fallen bottle. The guy she had seen in the hallway hovered pensively in the open doorway. He smiled, exposing a

The hall was lined with people, a steady stream of traffic rolling past as she slumped against the wall. It felt as she had been shot into a hideously enlarged vain, but instead of blood cells the artery was flowing human bodies. A guy carrying three overflowing cups spun in a circle to avoid someone’s mad dash to the bathroom. He looked at her as he passed, smiled, and then slipped quietly into the room she had just left.

“I think he likes you...” a female voice said to her left.

She pretended not to notice, turning her back to the voice.

The bathroom as someone ran in with a towel to wipe up the spreading puddle of beer. The girl on the floor ripped the cloth away and began awkwardly scrubbing beer from her chest with a limp wrist. Most of the room laughed, the rest stared blankly. As the adrenaline rush of breaking glass faded the party lost interest, pulled away from the diversion by the pulsating drone of the stereo. One by one they re-gained the beat and floated off to their private universes of clinched conversation.

“Hey, you mind if I sit here?”

A shot of hot, foul breath forced her to recognize the guy who had stumbled up beside her. He was now in the slow, laborious process of simultaneously sitting down without spilling his cup while trying to put up a suave facade. She drew up a little tighter and he sloshed beer into her shoes.

“Oh.. Oh.. Shit...um, sorry about that,” he said as he bent to wipe the droplets from her patent boots. She looked around the room for someone she could pretend to need to speak to. When she glanced down, he had paused in mid wipe to stare at her crotch. He noticed her looking and broke his gaze only long enough to mumble something about liking this side of her better. She stood up quickly and edged around the doorjamb into the hallway, leaving him slumped against the footstool.

The hall was lined with people, a steady stream of traffic rolling past as she slumped against the wall. It felt as she had been shot into a hideously enlarged vain, but instead of blood cells the artery was flowing human bodies. A guy carrying three overflowing cups spun in a circle to avoid someone’s mad dash to the bathroom. He looked at her as he passed, smiled, and then slipped quietly into the room she had just left.

“I think he likes you...” a female voice said to her left.
small gap in his front teeth.

“Do you want one? I can go get you another” he said. He stood on the porch, with the door pulled against him like a shield. His right hand was fidgeting with the sheers lining the glass paneled door.

“No, thanks, I’m fine.” She said as she turned to examine the ring of sweat left on the white-washed rail. The moon glinted faintly off the bottle through the bush below.

“Um, my name’s Ben, by the way” he said, extending his left hand gracelessly. She turned and faced him as he slipped a little further onto the porch. She extended hers, but didn’t leave the shadow of the post. He stared for a moment, looked back through the door and stepped from behind it like he was sliding out from beneath some huge weight. He took her hand briskly, but was amazed at how soft it was.

“I’m Margaret, nice to meet you.”

She couldn’t help staring at him. He looked so uncomfortable it almost pained her to watch him breathe, but in a way she thought it kind of cute. Refreshing anyway.

“I, uh, have been put in charge of drinks tonight, that’s why I asked.”

The hand he greeted her with was now jabbed firmly into the pocket of his tan pants. He rocked back and forth slightly, his brown saddle shoes peeking out from beneath a heavy cuff.

“I came out because I needed a break. I’ve been running all night.”

She looked toward the street. Traffic was slowing at the light, but at this time of night traffic was two or three cars.

“So you decided to take time out for one yourself?” she asked, turning her head as she walked to the edge of the porch. The moonlight painted her in a thin wash of silvery gray, her nose chasing shadows across her cheekbones like a sundial as she turned to sit on the top step.

“No, I don’t drink.” He said. “I don’t have anything against it, I just never acquired the taste.” As he spoke she turned and propped against the post, the bricks bleeding cold through her jeans.

“Between you and me, beer is the first cousin to piss. Sam Adams might as well have drained it right there in the bottle,” he said, with a hesitant grin. Margaret laughed, and noticed that as she did she could see him relax. It was if an invisible thread suspending him from the ceiling slacked off and let his feet make full contact with the painted floorboards.

“Are you waiting for someone?”

“Yeah,” she said with a smile.

“Do you mind if I wait with you?” he asked, his string re-tightening ever so slightly.

“No, not at all.”

He crossed the porch and sat on the edge, a step above her. He paused for a moment, and then asked “If you didn’t want to drink, why did you come?”

She looked at him. His face was average in almost every respect, but there was something about him that she liked. Perhaps the way he looked so remarkably sincere.

“I, uh, have been put in charge of drinks tonight, that’s why I asked.”

The hand he greeted her with was now jabbed firmly into the pocket of his tan pants. He rocked back and forth slightly, his brown saddle shoes peeking out from beneath a heavy cuff.

“I came out because I needed a break. I’ve been running all night.”

She looked toward the street. Traffic was slowing at the light, but at this time of night traffic was two or three cars.

“So you decided to take time out for one yourself?” she asked, turning her head as she walked to the edge of the porch. The moonlight painted her in a thin
He looked around for a moment, searching for something in the near darkness. Beneath the bush below he spied what he was looking for. He bent down, flicked a few leaves and sticks out of the way and straightened up, a small dark lump in his hand. She watched him as he carefully twisted the twig between his thumb and forefinger, driving it down into the lump. He began pinching off bits of the leaf until it was roughly rectangular, holding out his creation like a potter eyeing the symmetry of a piece. He let out a satisfied “Ahh” and turned to face her. He held in his palm a miniature boat. Its maple leaf sail arched out, caught in an invisible wind. Its pine-bark body formed a pointed bow, from which jutted another twig figurehead.

“Leaf-cutter’s Battleship,” he smiled. She laughed as he placed the miniature frigate on her knee. It balanced on the bone, looking like it was ready to sail over the end of the world. She picked it up by its rough, flaky hull and turned it in her hands.

“I used to make whole fleets when I was little” he said.

“Why don’t you now?” She asked, putting it on the edge of the porch. He looked at her for a moment, biting the inside of his lip. Her eyes smiled in the faintness of the moonlight. When she turned he could have sworn he saw the moon itself reflect in her pupils. He shrugged and looked toward the street.

“What time is your ride getting her?”

“I’m not waiting for a ride” she said, still staring at him.

“I thought you were waiting for someone?” he said, confused.

“I was.” She smiled. “Someone to talk to. Thank you.”
Telemachus
-Rebecca Knickmeyer

The scene: The bed chamber of Odysseus.
Time: Thirteen years after Odysseus’ return from the Trojan war.

(Telemachus enters Odysseus’ bed chamber. On the other side of the room, with his back turned to him, is Odysseus, packing a few weapons and clothes into a bundle.)

Telemachus
You are truly leaving then?

Odysseus
I have packed, haven’t I?

Telemachus
You have been pretending to pack many years too long for that to mean anything to me.

Odysseus
Today is different. I have found passage on a merchant boat to Africa. It leaves this afternoon. By sunset I will be far out at sea.

Telemachus
You mean to abandon this house?

Odysseus
I do.

Telemachus
To leave your land, your subjects, your servants? Be reasonable.

Odysseus
I am...reasonable.

Telemachus
Have you no idea of responsibility. Will you leave the wife who waited faithfully for you for twenty years? The wife who refused a thousand men for your memory, who wove and unwove your shroud until her fingers were bleeding?

Odysseus
(turning angrily towards Telemachus) My wife! Yes, it is strange I should wish to leave her, but I must confess I love... harbor to watch the waves roll out to sea and the sailors they took with them, she believed me to be seeing other women.

Telemachus
I daresay you’ve had enough adventures of that sort to rightfully alert her suspicions.

Odysseus
I might have had one or two, perhaps, during those long years away, but I suppose you do not want to hear of them, though I recall that once you longed for me to tell of them across the evening table or before the fire.

Telemachus
I enjoyed fantasies then, but I need no stories of women who live not, now. Dream women. I will marry a girl of flesh, blood, bone, and breath.
Odysseus
You would not say that if you had seen them, nor anything worthy of being near them. How golden were their skins, like olive oil that runs down the sides of gleaming brown jugs. Necks like swans and eyes like coals, before they crumble into steaming dark ashes. And in their arms it always felt as the rocking of the sea.

Telemachus
Shut your mind from these thoughts. I will hear no more stories.

Odysseus
It was your mother who forbade the stories.

Telemachus
You cannot go. You are old and sick. No longer can you fight nor even walk as you once did. Stay here and we will take care of you. You would dishonor us, and pain us if you went.

Odysseus
You would have me die here, Telemachus. Here! Tortured by the sounds of ships at sea. Looking every day from my window to its ceaselessly fleeing waves as they wash away the insignificant days of my life. Oh, if only this were not an island, surrounded by my torment. Do you not understand that this place is a prison to me? To sit still is to be bound. After my travels, I was so full of joy to return to my home, my Ithaca, only to find all the rooms shrunk too small for body or mind. What once seemed great is now only a toy, a flimsy painted miniature of the things that I have seen. Every boat in the harbor, every wave on the sand, every bird that passes, shrieking, overhead, every pebble thrown on this shore has a voice which calls me, that urges me to escape. In the night they peel away my skin until only my desire for adventure remains, bitten and stung by the salt air. Is this what you want for me?

Telemachus
No!

Odysseus
You desire my punishment for the wounds you feel you have suffered from my absence. I too have suffered from absence.

Telemachus
You misunderstand.

Odysseus
Do you call yourself my son? My friend?

Telemachus
Odysseus!

Odysseus
No! (He turns and leans against the wall) I have no friends, but the memories of friends are borne in on the evening breeze. Tattered ghosts of soldiers and allies from the siege on Troy. They urge me to follow in their footsteps again. I see their images in the summer moon and the movement of the leaves of the tree beside the gate, late at night when you do not know the world. They race on the edges of the air and fill up sails with their breath. It is I alone who remain. (He struggles for breath) Who remains idle...(he begins to cough violently.)
Telemachus
Father, father! You are not well; let me help you.
(Telamachus catches Odysseus and leads him to the bed)
Look at yourself. You are sick in body and in mind. Let me take care of you, father. (He leans Odysseus’ head on his shoulder).

Odysseus
Let me tell you the story, Telemachus, my son.

Telemachus
No, I will not listen to your tales again. You would have me be the same as you. A heart so full of hunger. I would burn and starve to feed on horizons, poor food to eat in the end.

Odysseus
It is beautiful.

Telemachus
Not for me.

Odysseus
You have not seen the sunrise, lush and red on the island of Circe, nor heard the Greek cries of victory and the plaintive groping call of the Sirens.

Telemachus
It seems that you hear them still.

Odysseus
Perhaps I should tell it once more. Maybe the memories will escape to the sky.

Telemachus
You know they will not, father. Sleep awhile.
M i n s

Worn-in Levi’s $12 each Retrowear
Vintage clothes
Baltimore’s best postcards
Discount Silver Jewelry
Poetry & Original Artwork

Wednesday-Sunday
11am-7pm

733 South Anne Street (at Lancaster)
Fells Point
(410) 732-4258

Coffee Cafe

6303 York Road
(410) 435-3040

Enjoy coffee, live daily. Beans roasted on site at your request. Along with your favorite “brew” indulge in our fresh gourmet desserts, pastries bagels and sandwiches.

Hours:
Monday-Saturday, 7am-7pm and Sunday, 7am-5pm Contributors:

Sarah Azizi               Reece McClung
Audrey Babkirk          Jonathan Musgrove
Timothy Black            Neel Patel
Karen Barbour            Jennifer Parde
Jonathan Colson          Sarah Pinsker
Jenn Crowell             Angela Regas
Sharae Deckard           Megary Sigler
Jessica Dolber           Jordie Shapiro
Russel Drylie            Margaret Slack
Sheila Green             Sarah Smith
Rebecca Knickmeyer       Chang Sun
Andrej Krasnansky        Aya Tsuchimochi
R. Jason Leahey          Jer Welter
Janine Levin             Jordanna Woodward
Donna Maglio             Corinna Yost